The problem of physical co-morbidity in people with a mental illness is receiving increasing recognition. Lifestyle factors, side effects of medication, genetic influences and inequalities in health service provision may all combine to lead to an increased prevalence of physical illness in this population. Maintaining the skills necessary for the detection of common medical disorders in people with mental illness, is an essential component of psychiatric practice.

This course brings together a range of experts to provide you with an update on the common physical disorders that occur in your everyday practice, followed by a practical session to refresh your physical examination skills.

This course will provide:

- A medical overview from a range of local experts of the common problems that occur in everyday practice including endocrinology, cardiology, neurology and respiratory conditions
- Tips and techniques to help to psychiatrists deal with these problems
- An opportunity for practical hands-on experience of conducting physical examinations in a supportive environment to build your confidence

Course fee:

£200.00 including course materials, refreshments and buffet lunch.

Accreditation:

This course is eligible for 6 CPD hours subject to peer group approval. Delegates are required to register at the start and finish in order to receive a certificate of attendance.
