Out of sight for too long

By Helen Killaspy

People with complex mental health problems are one of the most marginalised groups in society and among the least able to advocate for themselves. Centre for Mental Health's briefing report on long stay mental health rehabilitation facilities has identified a number of worrying issues related to the quality of care they offer. Most of these are a direct consequence of years of disinvestment in local rehabilitation services and a historic lack of policy to guide NHS commissioners and trusts in what is required to support successful recovery for this group.

There is good evidence that when local mental health rehabilitation services are available, around two-thirds of people with complex needs are supported to achieve sustained, successful community living, without the need for further readmissions to hospital (Killaspy et al., 2016). The most effective mental health rehabilitation services are organised into a whole system care pathway, that includes specialist inpatient care provided by the NHS and supported accommodation provided by the third sector. Around 80% of referrals into this pathway are people in acute mental health wards who have not recovered adequately to be discharged, with Mental health patients are being sent too far away from home, for too long at too much cost to the NHS.

The Care Quality Commission has criticised the number of mental health facilities which they say isolate them off from local services and return home.

Summary

Mental health rehabilitation services provide specialist care to people with complex needs that cannot be met by other mental health services. They provide treatment and support for between 10% and 20% of people with a severe mental illness, both in hospital and in the community.

Centre for Mental Health has explored current provision of rehabilitation services in England for reviewing advanced Care Quality Commission reports and seeking expert opinion. This briefing summarises the current issues facing rehabilitation services and the people who use them.

Rehabilitation services have been marginalised in national mental health policy for many years. As a result,
